

The growth reaction and pigments amount in wheat seedlings under water deficit modeling osmotic stress was studied. An environmental increasing of osmotic stress is an inductor of pigment systems changes. The pigment systems sensitivity depends on the type of pigments. The data observed in the experiment can be useful for early diagnostic potential resistance varieties to water deficit.

